The paradox he addresses in Making the Social World is that these facts only exist because we think they exist and yet they have an objective existence. Continuing a line of investigation begun in his earlier book The Construction of Social Reality, Searle identifies the precise role of language in the creation of all "institutional facts." His aim is to show how mind, language and civilization are natural products of the basic facts of the physical world described by physics, chemistry and ...

This, says Searle, is the main, and neglected, question for philosophy today, and Making the Social World extends and revises the earlier answers he gave to it in his 1995 book The Construction of Social Reality. It is disingenuous, he argues, to deny that money, marriage, governments and cocktail parties exist as objective facts - there are real-life consequences for those who take other people's money, or go to a cocktail party uninvited.
